I found an article on Help.Academy.com on how to use the "Add ons" or "libraries" for your After Effects project. It's very easy to navigate and doesn't seem to be cluttered with too many items. I was wondering if anyone had any experience using this library? It seems very well organized. It may not be working in Aperture, but in Aperture 3, I have After Effects CS6.5 working in the Bookshelf View. And the AE script is still working. And I do have the AE Scripts with AE CS6.5. And Aperture2 is working. Hm. When you say "from the on-screen menu, select Insert > Script Library...", do you mean that you already have AE CS6 installed? I'm still getting the same error message (same output, different error message) that you got, after I've uninstalled AE CS5.5 from the box it came in and then installed AE CS6 from the box it came in. The only way to get to the on-screen menu is through the app's preferences, I believe. I was browsing the preferences earlier today and didn't see a way to see the libraries, so I just assumed that it was part of the preferences. I'll go dig through it again. The menu items that you mention do not appear for me, in Aperture 2, under "Addons" or "Scripts." In Aperture 3, they don't appear anywhere that I can find. When I do get them, they look okay, so I haven't seen any indication that there's an issue. I just have to figure out how to navigate them. But in my case, it didn't have anything relevant to me at first glance. I was using the CS6 version of After Effects and not CS5.5 when I tried to get the script to work. When I got that version, the first thing I did was uninstalled the CS5.5 version from the system and then installed the CS6 version. So I'm sure that my issue is due to the version of AE that I'm using. Even though I'm fairly new to AE, I can't believe that you were installing and uninstalling AE during the process of trying to get this to work. I'm glad that you got it working, but my comment was more for everyone else who's trying 82157476af
